The most acclaimed Hindi movie of recent times, Veer Zaara is easily the longest Bollywood movie ever made. It was released in 2004 and ran for a staggering five hours and forty-five minutes. Even so, it managed to sweep the Filmfare Awards that year and was declared 'film of the year' by critics. The film is set in India. It follows the story of the relationship between Meera (Aishwarya Rai), a young woman from Bombay, and Zaara (Amir Khan), a soldier-turned-rancher who has recently returned from Afghanistan. To its credit, Veer Zaara is not another war movie; it is an attempt to capture something different, to tell the tale of two different people living in two different worlds who come together and make a go of it. The film is based on Elizabeth Wein's novel The Vegetarian (2001). "Veer" is the name of the horse awarded to Meera by her father in recognition of her talent and success. "Zaara" is a rare breed of camel prized for its beauty and hardiness in the desert. The film begins with Meera (Aishwarya Rai) and Zaara (Amir Khan) meeting for the first time. There is an immediate attraction between them, something that exists only in their imaginations at this point. Zaara is a charismatic poet who has returned home to Bombay to make his fortune; Meera is the daughter of a man (Victor Bannerjee) who has made his fortune as a film financier, and has become rich as well as powerful. Meera's father is determined that Meera should marry one of her father's associates; in truth, he would prefer if she married the suave Malik (Dalip Tahil). As with most Bollywood movies about love, there is something that threatens the relationship between Zaara and Meera. But it isn't simply petty interference in this instance; in fact, it isn't merely one thing at all. The first threat to the young couple is revealed to us through a flashback. It is a scene from Meera's childhood, and begins with a little boy (Shah Rukh Khan) asking the two girls if they would like to play a game. The boy has a new bike, and offers to race the girls for it. Even though Meera is several years younger than him, she defeats him—and takes his bike as her prize. In winning the bike she also wins the attention of Zaara. And so, their relationship begins: Zaara loves Meera for her pride and daring; Meera loves Zaara for his strength and skill with horses—and especially his horse Veer.
